Sherlin Shares Update on Local Development Projects

Former Athens Mayor Steven Sherlin provided an update this week regarding several highly anticipated development projects in the city.

Sherlin announced that plans for a Panda Express and a shopping center at the site of the old Russell Stover building have fallen through and will no longer be moving forward. Additionally, plans for a separate shopping center proposed across from Walmart have also been canceled, though other parties have shown interest in the property.

There is still potential for new projects in the area. Sherlin noted that the Russell Stover property is continuing to receive interest, and discussions remain positive for the development of a new hotel behind the former candy factory site. In addition, there is renewed interest in the former Shoney's property, with the possibility of a restaurant project moving forward, pending further announcements.

While Sherlin acknowledged the community's disappointment, he pointed to ongoing renovations at the former Big Lots shopping center as a positive sign of continued growth and investment in Athens.
