Rare Etowah Depot Paintings Donated to Historical Commission

Two original paintings of the Etowah Depot by local artist Francis Patterson have been donated to the Etowah Historical Commission (EHC) by John and Melissa Goins, who purchased the works at an art auction specifically to ensure they would remain in the community.

Jim Caldwell, chair of the commission, expressed appreciation for the gift, noting the importance of preserving local history and honoring artists connected to Etowah. The donation brings the commission's total to three known Patterson depot paintings. Only five are currently known to exist, with one held by the Tennessee State Museum and another in private ownership. A third EHC-owned painting was discovered during the demolition of a building in Sweetwater and is in need of restoration.

Patterson, born Martha Francis Patterson in Sweetwater in 1874, later lived in Etowah with her husband, Charles Shadden Harris, and their son. Historical records show she worked as a hotel chamber maid later in life. She died in 1970 and is buried at Greenhill Cemetery in Etowah.

Caldwell said questions remain about when Patterson began painting and why she painted the Etowah Depot multiple times, adding, "We would love to learn more about Francis Patterson. We hope people with knowledge about this unique artist will contact EHC to share what they know about her and her life."
